9:00-9:30 am Perspectives on Biomedical Research: Creating a Pipeline of New Treatments

Leading global experts have stated that a coordinated, diverse effort has the potential to reduce suicide, psychosis, and mental illness-related disability by 50% by 2030. A key pillar to achieving this goal is an advancement in our understanding of the biological processes that underpin brain health. Fortunately, research efforts are yielding what is already being called “the golden age of neuroscience.” What will advances in our scientific understanding of mental health mean for our approaches to it? A discussion about the state of the science and efforts leading to scientific advancement will be led by:

Dr. Shelli Avenevoli, Deputy Director, National Institute of Mental Health

Dr. Husseini Manji, Global Head, Neuroscience, Johnson & Johnson

Moderator: Garen Staglin

9:30-10:30 am Access to Treatment and Reaching Parity with Physical Health

How does the growing scientific understanding of mental health conditions lead to better outcomes for people? How do more people utilize the right services, support, and treatments at the right times? What does parity mean from the payer perspective, what are the biggest roadblocks that remain today, and to what extent can policy address those challenges? We will discuss the current state of access, including parity between mental and physical health in both ambition and practice.
